1. atay bina `nā`
   Gunpowder green tea is steeped with a bundle of fresh mint leaves and lots of sugar. It is common for Moroccan families to drink several cups of tea per day, and it is served to guests in both personal and professional settings.

2. shāy istkān
   Traditional Iraqi tea is super strong and super sweet: black tea is steeped for hours and its strength is balanced with a hefty dose of sugar. Highly caffeinated, Iraqi tea is sipped throughout the day.

3. shāy halīb
   Chai haleeb, literally “milk tea” is black tea steeped with cardamom and is usually consumed in Yemen. Evaporated or condensed milk is added.

4. shāy bilbunduq
   Tunisian tea can be either green or black. Just like its Moroccan counterpart, it is commonly steeped with fresh mint and sugar. Its most distinctive feature is the nuts that are added to the cups after serving — pine nuts, almonds and peanuts are all common.

5. karkadeh
   Karkadeh tea is made with dried hibiscus flowers, which are steeped to give this tea its deep red color and tart flavor. Karkadeh can be served hot or iced, and is traditionally consumed for iftar during the holy month of Ramadān.

6. shāy karak
   Similar to what we think of as Indian chai in the West, karak is an aromatic blend of black tea steeped in milk with a variety of spices, including cinnamon and cardamom. This tea is drunk in the Gulf region.
